

What May Be Business Income

This guide helps users identify deposits that may need tax review before checking the Tax box in the organizer.

Common receipts that may be business income

- Cash payments received from customers or clients.
- Checks received for products, services, contract work, or other business activity.
- Electronic payments such as Zelle, Cash App, ACH/direct deposit, Venmo, or similar payment services when received for business activity.
- Credit or debit card sales and payment-processor deposits.
- Service income, sales receipts, commissions, fees, and other amounts received for business work.
- Amounts received through online marketplaces or platforms when connected to the business.

Not every deposit into a bank account is income. Transfers between your own accounts, borrowed money, owner contributions, refunds, reimbursements, and other deposits may have different treatment.

Items that need review before marking Tax

- Transfers between bank accounts owned by the same person or business.
- Loan proceeds or borrowed money.
- Owner contributions or personal money deposited into the business.
- Refunds, returned purchases, insurance proceeds, or reimbursements.
- Money received on behalf of another person.
- Personal gifts or other nonbusiness deposits.

Use the Tax checkbox only after deciding that the transaction belongs in the tax-organizing report.

Important: This guide is for general record-organizing purposes only. It does not determine whether a particular receipt is taxable or whether an expense is deductible. Tax treatment depends on the facts and applicable law. Consult a qualified tax professional when needed.
